9. New Publication on School Connectedness from CDC's Division of Adolescent and School Health

School connectedness is the belief by students that the adults and peers at their school care about their learning and about them as individuals. Research indicates that students who feel connected to their school are more likely to engage in healthy behaviors and succeed academically.

In particular, connected students are less likely to use alcohol and other drugs, miss school, have sex at an early age, or be involved in violence or behaviors that increase their risk for injury (such as drinking and driving). They are also more likely to attend school regularly, stay in school longer, and have higher grades and classroom test scores.

To help schools enhance this important protective factor, CDC scientists have created a guide that synthesizes available research on school connectedness and outlines strategies for fostering it. School Connectedness: Strategies for Increasing Protective Factors Among Youth identifies six evidence-based strategies that teachers, administrators, school staff, and parents can implement to increase the extent to which students feel connected to school. 10. The Challenges, Promising Practices and Recommendations to Overcoming Intimate Partner Violence in Immigrant and Refugee Communities in America

Intimate partner violence (IPV) is a pattern of assaultive and coercive behaviors—physical assault, psychological or emotional abuse, sexual assault, progressive social isolation, stalking—designed to establish control by a person who is, was or wishes to be involved in an intimate or dating relationship. IPV is a widespread, costly and complex social problem nationwide with serious health and safety implications.

The Robert Wood Johnson Foundation solicited the assistance of the Family Violence Prevention Fund (FVPF) to collect information on the challenges, prevention and treatment of IPV in immigrant and refugee communities.

After reviewing the literature, collecting data from interviews and examining existing prevention and treatment programs, FVPF issued a report, "Intimate Partner Violence in Immigrant and Refugee Communities: Challenges, Promising Practices and Recommendations", which examines the issue from a variety of standpoints, offering recommendations and summaries for future work and funding efforts.
